The world series seemed to affect the patronage at the holiday matiness yesterday. This, coupled with the fact that the public this season has not turned out in record making numbers to attend the plays, made attendance at the various houses smaller in comparison to other Columbus Days, particularly the anniversary which followed the war. But still there was a goodly influx of theatregoers, especially when balanced terday. Successes and such standard entertainments as that at the Hippodrome were crowded to the doors, And in the evening, when the crowds that had been watching the Yankees and the Giants were released from their important mission in life, they filled the legitimate theatres, the variety halls and the cinema palsons along Broadway to overflowing, thereby making up for the decrease in the afternoon.
